> VISION PROBLEMS
CAN BE MISTAKEN
FOR LEARNING
CHALLENGES

Around this time of year, children are being evaluated for potential learning disabilities to explain their challenges with reading and learning.

It is important for parents to understand that before children are to be diagnosed with ADHD or any Specific Learning Disabilities such as Dyslexia, vision is supposed to be ruled out as a possible cause for the symptoms the child is struggling with (as well as any other potentially contributing factor such as hearing, etc.).

It might interest you to know that the majority of children we see in our office who struggle with reading can see the letters on the eye chart just fine, but they also have a variety of visual deficits contributing to their challenges. These children will appear to have normal vision during eye tests at the doctor's office, which only assesses their ability to read letters on a chart.

While this article focuses on children, the information is true for many adults who continue to struggle with paperwork, reading, etc.

Please help us bring awareness to your friends and family about the vital connection between vision problems and a child or teenager's ability to read and learn.

WITH DRY EYE?

Dry eye can happen for a number of different reasons, which is why we offer multiple treatment options to help relieve redness and irritation. Treatment options include a special lid scrub (We Love Eyes), a wide variety of artificial tears, as well as specially formulated Omega 3s designed to address dry eyes (DE3 Dry Eye Omega Benefits® by Physicians Recommended Nutraceuticals).

For more advanced cases we provide non-drug treatments which address the root cause of dry eye by unblocking the glands that secrete oily lipids and returning the eye back to its normal function.

The first step toward finding relief is to schedule a dry eye evaluation. Our doctors can analyze the surface of your eyes and lids to see the depth of your problem and determine your best treatment options.
